After they had proceeded about eighteen miles, Cook roposed to turn out of the road and take a nearer way through the woods. They were then in a very broken, unsettled forest country. They passed down Champe, struck him a blow on the side of the head that brought him to the ground. He fell on his face. Cook rolled him over upon his back, gave him another blow across the forehead which broke in his skull, and killed him so dead that he never moved afproceeded on about 2 miles farther to his relative's in Franklin county, where he remained three or four days, exhibiting nothing unusual in his appearance.

About six weeks afterwards the body was found enquiry was excited; and suspicion settled on Cookhe was pursued to Kentucky, arrested, and on his way back, confessed the murder. He confessed it to some brought back, tried at Brookville, and sentenced to be Houghman, N. Bolton, John Cox, T. Triggs, J. Dar-hung. The Supreme Court decided the indictment on which he was convicted bad, and directed it to be quashed. He was re-indicted, took a change of venue to Union county, and has there been again convicted and sentenced. His friends are about making application to the Governor to commute his punishment to imprisonment for life. This arises out of the strong and growing repugnance to capital punishment. In that sentiment we concur, and trust the Governor will make the commutation.
